

Special Issue

Socioecology and Biodiversity Conservation—2nd Edition

Message from the Guest Editor

Due to worldwide co-evolutive reasons, hot spots of biodiversity coincide with hot spots of cultural, and even linguistic, diversity. Therefore, to preserve global biodiversity, socio-ecological studies on local communities must be conducted. These studies must take into account the social, economic and cultural needs and aspirations of the local communities in relation to biodiversity conservation policies. This Special Issue focuses on describing the interactions between the local inhabitants and environmental systems all around the world. It aims to help understand how social groups contextualize ecological knowledge, anthropic activities contribute to modifying the environment, cultural and economic aspects influence the use, management and conservation of their ecological environment, and to understand social phenomena in light of ecological knowledge.
