Nutrition and Human Oral Health

Message from the Guest Editors

Nutrition on oral health has been given much more attention in recent times, contributing to a better understanding of cariogenic processes, periodontal inflammation, and dysbiosis of the microbiome. Research on this topic demands adequate methods for collecting or generating relevant data as well as for analyzing these data. This Special Issue welcomes manuscripts on:

- To collect nutrition data of high quality e.g., tools for dietary intake measurements;
- To determine aspects of oral health, e.g., oral microbiology, oral health status, oral and systemic inflammation;
- Data analytic approaches to investigate the relation between nutrition and oral health, e.g., machine learning and causal inference;
- To take into account specific characteristics of the data, e.g., compositional data analysis or methods for high dimensional data.

We welcome different types of manuscripts, including suggestions for new methods, systematic investigations on existing methods, review and reflection papers, as well as case studies motivated by an interesting method or a novel application. Dipl.-Math. Kirstin Vach Priv.-Doz. Dr. Johan Wölber
