Skin and Formulation

Message from the Guest Editors

The area of skin formulations gathers knowledge from several scientific disciplines, yet the interactions between the skin and the formulations remain a challenge for pharmacists, biologists, chemists and physicians. Formulations are aimed at the topical or transdermal delivery of pharmacologically active compounds. Some products meet the definitions of both cosmetics and drugs, and formulations play an important role in this definition. This Special Issue is directed at formulation variables affecting the development of topical and transdermal drug products, aspects related to drug-excipients, drug-skin and excipient-skin interactions, and technological innovative strategies to overcome the skin barrier properties for effective drug delivery. It is our pleasure to invite you to submit a manuscript to this Special Issue. Full papers, communications, and reviews are welcome. Dr. Sandra I.D. Simões
