Industrial Upgrading and Regional Development in Global Low-Carbon Transformation

Message from the Guest Editors

Since the industrial revolution, demand for natural resources, e.g., land, water, and energy, has been sharply increasing to meet the needs of a rising global population and economic development. This Special Issue corroborates this approach by debating the importance of energy transition, financial and trade globalization, and regional industrial sustainable development.

- Industrial development path under environment-friendly conditions
- Green economic modeling and mining involving green growth
- Reconstruction of global value chain system and green productivity
- Embodied carbon and green trade in global value chain
- Green one belt, one road, and foreign investment development
- Energy transition industrial dynamics observed around the world
- Mechanism and test of green innovation in realizing carbon neutralization
- Resource utilization efficiency in the low-carbon transformation context
- Combing the experience of green and low-carbon transformation in various countries
